

CONTENTS

EDITORS' NOTES	1
James P. Pappas, Jerry Jerman
1. Adult Degrees and the Learning Society	5
William H. Maehl
This opening chapter lays the groundwork for this volume by outlining the history and development of the "adult degree revolution."
2. Adult Learning Theory and the Pursuit of Adult Degrees	17
Richard Kiely, Lorilee R. Sandmann, Janet Truluck
A four-lens model provides a useful means for understanding adult learning. This model is complemented by vignettes of adult students who are pursuing degrees, demonstrating the intersection of theory and practice.
3. Faculty Issues Related to Adult Degree Programs	31
Lauren E. Clarke, Trent E. Gabert
Faculty preparation for teaching in adult degree programs varies from institution to institution and reflects many trends in higher education, including the use of part-time and non-tenure-track faculty.
4. Enhancing Adult Learning Through Interdisciplinary Studies	41
Daphne W. Ntiri, Roslyn Abt Schindler, Stuart Henry
In this chapter, an interdisciplinary course offers a discerning case study of how the interdisciplinary curriculum is well suited to degree programs for adult learners.
5. Marketing and Retention Strategies for Adult Degree Programs	51
Joann A. Brown
Effective marketing of adult degree programs requires integrating planning, market research, program and services development, and retention strategies into a matrix where the focus remains on the adult student.
6. Adult Degree Programs: How Money Talks, and What It Tells	61
Gary W. Matkin
Multiple factors, including reduced funding, increased competition, and emergence of online programs, have transformed the financial picture for higher education institutions and adult degree programs.

7. Technology and the Adult Degree Program: The Human Element	73
Frank G. Rodriquez, Susan Smith Nash
Faculty and administrators must keep in mind that the success of on-line degree programs for adults is at least partly a reflection of the merger of technology and the human element.
8. Accreditation Issues Related to Adult Degree Programs	81
Edward G. Simpson Jr.
This chapter outlines the accreditation process in relation to adult degree programs and the key players in that process.
9. Future Considerations	91
James P. Pappas, Jerry Jerman
Administrators looking at developing adult degree programs must consider a number of factors related to trends and possible future developments.
INDEX	97